To change a digit, the program must first convert a key value from the ROM to a byte value (which, in turn, must be converted from another byte value to a value that can be interpreted as the digit that is next modified). The digit will be converted to its new form after being verified. The number of bytes changed can be determined by comparing the computer's operating system's system clock reading to the value of the digit as it is written or, if the computer does not have any operating system information, comparing the time at which the computer received the byte value of the digit with the number of seconds since its initialization on June 4th, 1979.
